Manager Commentary

In February the Fund rose 3.1% and the IA North America sector rose 1.8%. Relative strength remained in energy and industrials.

There continued to be a move away from large technology, which was down in the month. This fitted with our view and we had been outperforming strongly until a research piece from Citrin Research on the future with AI hit the consumer side of our portfolio. We call this our barbell strategy as this side does well when commodities and industrials are weaker. However, the report predicted that AI will reduce the share of labour in GDP so fast that houses, boats and teddy bears will become unaffordable in a world of high GDP growth, yet high unemployment. The market took this seriously and our stocks acted as though paucity had immediately arrived. We feel consumer spending will hold up better due to the redistributive agency of government and the urge of humans to pay other humans. We have done well from the capital spend on AI but were hurt by this dystopian jobless future. We feel our barbell may be too evenly balanced to minimise risk as we could have done better with a more lopsided lean into our strengths.

The migration from large tech principally benefitted mid-caps and we again beat the smaller cap indices. In a fast-moving news environment, the market has re-focused on geopolitics and de-globalisation, which favours our weightings. Initially, however, fear has resulted in profits being locked down, which has hurt as our stocks have been winning.

We are maintaining high weights in energy and industrials, as all Middle East entropy since 1979 has been greater and longer than expected. Resultant American introspection continues to favour these sectors, including an ever-faster AI race, to retain advantage in a rivalrous world.
