Manager Commentary (GBP)

In October the Fund went up by 1.7% and the IA North America sector went down by 0.5%. The S&P 500 went down by 1.7%. This month, unusually, mid-cap value was the best. Every category gets their month in the sun but some get more than others. There were opposing forces this month. Tech fell and caused widening bond spreads, which hurt small stocks. Additionally, war pushed up energy prices which pushed up inflation, favouring value for their lower P/E.

The weighting of tech in the S&P 500 is so large that tech alone caused this index to be down and this left mid-caps best. Industrials were flat as every company seems some way involved with the data centre construction boom. Real yields hit the highest level for years sending down commodity prices and in particular, precious metals. Uranium stocks, but not the price of uranium, were caught up in this sell-off and are now down on the year. We have not changed our positions.

The Fund was helped by our energy stocks rising to near their May highs. Also, community banks rose to highs after earnings showed improving net interest margins. We retain a 15.2% weighting in this group within an overall weighting in financials of 18.6%. Consumer durables rallied off their lows at the end of the month and Climb, a long-term holding which distributes tech and is an AI beneficiary, gets a special mention for good earnings driving it to a new high and becoming second largest position at 4.1% of the Fund.

The technology funding question dominates the market. Tech funding demands led to high real yields and now there is doubt whether revenues from tokens will arrive in time for AI providers to justify their capital investments. If capital spending has to slow, to wait for revenues, the pressure comes off bonds and durables will rally further. If suddenly productivity rises, as the tech industry expects, everything reverses and tech recovers its lead. The former case prevailed in October. We are trying to keep out of the way, staying in low P/E and low-debt companies. There are widely varying opinions on these questions and with such uncertainty we predict the result will be the advancement of the uninvolved.
